Quiz

1. In the Patsy David and Claudia Bolton article, A Guide to Developing Community Connectors, it states that people play different roles in our lives. One role is that of an ALLY. What is the best way to describe an ally?
  - A. An ally is a person who shares personal relationships.
  - B. An ally typically takes a side in an argument, for example a political ally.
  - C. An ally would teach a person a new skill if needed.
  - D. None of the above.

2. People with disabilities are often encouraged to be independent. Which answer best describes why interdependent is a better word to describe how we are all connected?
  - A. Being interdependent means you need support from people and without it, you wouldn't be successful.
  - B. Being interdependent means you give as much to your community as you get from it. None of us independently produce all our own food, our car parts, the material for our clothes... we work together to live the lives we wish.
  - C. Independence remains the better term to describe what individuals with disabilities need to aspire to because they have to work harder to prove to typical people that they can succeed.
  - D. Support Brokers must use both terms because the traditional service system believes in independence and the newer programs believe in interdependence. It's just a detail Brokers have to deal with.

3. Judith Snow told us about Peter. In her story, Peter is described as a young man who had gifts to share with others. His family and supporters found great ways that he could share his gifts. According to the author how are gifts defined?
  - A. Gifts are something everyone has; they are not unique to just a few people.
  - B. Gifts are unique and extraordinary, only special people are blessed with giftedness.
  - C. Gifts can not be acquired, they are present at birth.
  - D. People with Autism are the only people with disabilities who are known to have special talents and gifts.

4. In A Guide to Developing Community Connectors, you read about Rock's Café. The authors quote Ray Oldenburg when they describe "Third Places." These are places where the authors believe people with disabilities naturally fit in because "Third Places" tend to be accepting and "one's station in life is insignificant." What is another key factor that makes a place like Rock's Café successful?
- A. It is very cheap. People with disabilities have no money—Third Places have to offer food for almost nothing
  - B. Third Places are always diners. People with disabilities don't cook so eating out is an important option.
  - C. Third places are neutral places where people can become "regulars."
  - D. The Rock Café is designed only for people with disabilities. You do not have to worry about intruders and outsiders at a place like the Rock Café.
5. Lia Haile described what community inclusion meant to her. She talked about activities she enjoys and some she wishes were more available. What was one of the biggest things that keep her from community activities?
- A. Cost
  - B. Service Providers
  - C. Weather
  - D. Accessibility
